THOUSAND OAKS, Calif., Oct. 22, 2019 /PRNewswire/ -- Amgen (NASDAQ: AMGN) today announced the planned retirement of David W. Meline, who has served as the company's executive vice president and chief financial officer (CFO) since 2014. Meline will serve as CFO through the end of 2019 and remain at the company into the second quarter of 2020 to help ensure a smooth transition of his responsibilities. The company also announced that Peter H. Griffith has joined Amgen as executive vice president, Finance, and will be Meline's successor as CFO as of Jan. 1, 2020.

"I am grateful to David for the many contributions he has made to Amgen's success," said Robert A. Bradway, chairman and chief executive officer. "David has played an essential role in the enterprise-wide transformation that has enabled Amgen to deliver outstanding financial performance to our shareholders, while also investing heavily in new product launches, research and development, and global expansion. Additionally, under David's leadership, Amgen has built and embedded a set of productivity capabilities throughout our organization that position us for continued success in a highly dynamic external environment."

Meline joined Amgen from 3M, where he was senior vice president and CFO. Previously, Meline held numerous senior-level roles at General Motors, including vice president and CFO for GM North America.

"A hallmark of Amgen's nearly 40-year history has been well-planned transitions of key leadership roles," Bradway said. "I am delighted to welcome Peter to Amgen. His extensive global experience and financial skills will be instrumental to our strategy for investing in innovation to drive long-term growth. I am pleased that David will remain with Amgen into 2020 to work with Peter and ensure a smooth transition."
